

Population Health Worker

What does a Population Health Worker Do?

A population health worker obtains reviews and analyses health information, plans and manages a project to improve the health of populations

What do I Study to become a Population Health Worker?

- Bachelor of Science (Population Health) – University of Wollongong
- Bachelor of Arts (Population Health) – University of Wollongong

A day in the life of a rural Population Health Worker

As a population Health Worker you will be focussing on the nature and analysis of population health and the systems established for its promotion. There is great emphasis on the scientific basis of public health (statistics and epidemiology), together with the social, policy and communication aspect of population health

Career opportunities

- Health Promotion
- Health Services
- Government
- Media
- Health Departments

What sort of person should I be?

- Good problem solving skills
- Management skills
- Communication skills
- Interest and awareness of current health issues
- Interest in policy writing
- Caring and understanding of public health